ABSTRACT
Multinational financial institutions are vulnerable to extraterritorial jurisdictional claims, especially under United States anti-money laundering (AML) and economic sanctions laws.

An empirical study shows that banks licensed in Australia have revised their standard form contracts so as to reduce the risks arising from extraterritorial enforcement of foreign laws. Under the new contracts, customers have purportedly consented ex ante to banks supplying confidential information directly to foreign states and agreed to the freezing of their bank accounts based on a possible breach of foreign law.

The contractual provisions are controversial because they circumvent the legal procedures that would otherwise apply in cases of international criminal, civil or regulatory assistance. The legal efficacy and policy implications of the contractual terms are analysed.
