Constitutional reform is vital if Sri Lanka is to leave behind its legacy of political violence and forge inter-ethnic reconciliation. Constitutional reform could occur through a replacement of the current constitution, through incremental constitutional change, or through a change in constitutional culture and practice.

Despite a process of public consultation and the establishment of a ‘Constitutional Assembly’, Sri Lanka’s attempts at radical constitutional reform by replacing its current constitution have stalled. In 2015 the country failed to grasp fully, a constitutional and transformative moment and lost the opportunity to introduce far-reaching constitutional change. Yet Parliament did introduce the 19th Amendment to the Constitution which resulted in a more balanced distribution of power between the executive and the legislature. This has also enabled the courts and some independent commissions to become independent. This was followed by a new law on the Right to Information. Both these reforms have altered significantly the scheme of constitutional government in the country. This seminar will analyze the impact of these changes, and ask if constitutional incrementalism, ordinary legislation and a change in political culture, are alternatives to radical constitutional change for deeply divided societies. Are there multiple constitutional moments allowing for multiple political bargains to be struck and for progressive and creeping change?
