States, Intergovernmental Relations, and Market Development: The case of contemporary China
by Professor Cheng Jinhua
East China University of Political Science and Law (ECUPL)

ABSTRACT
How has China become capitalist? And, will Chinese capitalism keep going as it did in the last four decades? There are obviously different answers from different perspectives. Professor Cheng will respond to these questions through looking into central-local relations and their impacts on long-run market growth from comparative perspectives. His short answer is that China’s intergovernmental framework in the late 20th century, as is conceptualized as “Market-Preserving Federalism” or “De Facto Federalism” by some political economists, significantly contributed to the rise of capitalism in China in its first two decades of reform and has been, unfortunately, declining since the turning of the 21st century. In particular, since President Xi took power in 2012, the Chinese intergovernmental framework has been suffering over-centralization, which is a notorious recurrent political problem in China, and led to a significant sacrifice of local governmental market incentives.

This makes the future of capitalism in China problematic. As a matter of theoretical concern, Professor Cheng also proposes an intergovernmental framework of “Dual Intergovernmental Transformation for Market Development” as a refined model of “Market-Preserving Federalism.” The talk is largely based on Professor Cheng’s new book, States, Intergovernmental Relations, and Market Development: Comparing Capitalist Growth in Contemporary China and 19th-century Untied States (Palgrave Macmillan, 2016, forthcoming).
