The Long-term Effect of Hedge Fund Activism in Japan
- How Often Do Hedge Funds “Succeed”, and What Happens Then?

Chairperson: Associate Professor Dan Puchniak, NUS Law

ABSTRACT
In the 2000s, Japanese listed companies experienced the first wave of hedge fund activism. This article, co-authored with Professor Wataru Tanaka of the University of Tokyo, investigates the long-term effect of this activism in Japan. Specifically, this article focuses on activist interventions (i.e. the acquisition of 5% or more shares) to Japanese companies from 2000 to 2011 and analyzes the changes to ROA and Tobin’s Q of such target companies up to seven years after the intervention by using propensity-score matching. As activist interventions in this period faced strong resistance from target companies’ management, the above analysis is also applied to a sub-set of interventions in which target companies responded positively to the requests of activists, such as the increase of payout to shareholders, appointment of an activist-affiliated director, or sale of non-core businesses.
