Citizenship Regimes: Understanding Citizenship in Global and Asian Perspectives

Speaker: Prof. Jo Shaw, University of Edinburgh
Chairperson: Prof. Jaclyn Neo, NUS Law

ABSTRACT
As a number of scholars have commented, citizenship or ‘nationality’ studies as a field of scholarship has historically suffered from an ‘Atlantic’ or ‘Northern hemisphere’ bias. There have been few attempts to develop conceptual models for understanding citizenship which work also for the global south or for continents such as Asia. As a counterpoint to the traditional approach, much of which is focused on immigration to ‘western’ countries or anglophone settler societies, the speaker argues in her research that we need to put factors such as decolonialisation and challenges such as democracy deficits front and centre when developing a conceptual model to understand citizenship on a global scale. This paper introduces the ‘citizenship regimes’ approach to studying citizenship, focusing in particular on challenges to the classic model of citizenship understood as an ideal of equality and democracy, making use of examples from across Asia.
